As study takes a pedagogical stance in demonstrating how results from theoretical Electrical Engineering practices seeks to put in place, and that this is immediately attainable with the present state of the art. The focus for this detailed study is provided by the type of solid state signaling and various communication systems currently being deployed throughout mainline railways. Safety and system reliability concerns dominate this domain. With such motivation, two issues are tackled: the special problem of software qualivance in these data-driven control systems, and the broader problem of design dependability. In our safety properties of the geographic data control logic for the railway interlocking, the latter examines the first upon which the distributed control system depends
